The COVID-19 pandemic has laid bare the systemic ableism that relegates people with disabilities to the margins of both society and healthcare. This seminar will examine ways in which common healthcare policy and protocol responses to COVID-19 can be seen to have ableist underpinnings, and often thus result in the exclusion and abandonment of people with disabilities. The seminar will conclude with a consideration of the ethical imperative for a human-rights-based approach to healthcare policies and protocols related to COVID-19.
